Short description

In philosophy of language and mind, I have worked on indexicals, particularly 'I', and demonstratives, on the nature of perceptual content and on the nature of concepts and of intentional mental states.

In epistemology, I have developed a form of "hinge epistemology" and I have explored its bearing on skepticism, epistemic closure, transmission of justification, relativism, testimony, our knowledge of basic logical laws and other basic principles of human inquiry.

At the interface between epistemology and the philosophy of mind, I have developed a pluralistic account of self-knowledge – that is, our knowledge of our own mental states, and investigated its consequences with respect to self-deception, Moore's paradox, intrapersonal disagreement and belief revision.

In history of analytic philosophy, my work concerns mostly G. E. Moore and L. Wittgenstein. I have focused on their work in epistemology and on the philosophy of mind and language of the “later” Wittgenstein.

Lately, I have developed an interest in topics in social epistemology (i.e. the nature of disagreement, of testimonial justification, of epistemic authority and injustice) and in the application of these ideas to the dissemination of knowledge in the digital era, and in the area of the medical humanities.
